L. G. Blackman expressed his disapproval of the "two clubs" system, which he said would inevitably retard the growth of the game. He suggest-ed the abolishment of the national clubs in favor of the formation of other clubs, which he was of the opinion could be organized to the number of perhaps half a dozen. More interest, he thought, would be taken in Associa-tion football if this course were pur-sued, and the number of active particlpants in the game would become much larger. Two matches could be played between England and Scotland season to settle the moot question of
